Unlike Facebook or Snapchat, it's hard to feel content when only your closest friends and loved ones are progressing and communicating with your posts. Watching others gain followers before you get left behind can trigger feelings of inadequacy similar to watching cool kids in high school eat at the best table in the dining room. Further reading there is a fine line between finding the desperate and building your personal brand, but it can be walked with the right set of leadership. Below we have outlined some tips to help you gain more followers on Twitter. Just make sure you employ them sparingly. Step 1: Choose the right photos The first views are important, especially on Twitter. Since your profile is one of the first things people will see, it is important to choose a profile photo and a cover photo that can be identified when small. Whether one of your tweets pops up in someone's timeline, or someone is looking for you specifically and previews your profile, you want to be able to recognize you for you. Still, try to think about it. For a personal account, it's best to use your face image for your profile picture. This can be a real photo or illustration; You just want something that shows off who you are. Your cover photo allows you to express themselves in a slightly larger format, and may include banners from your latest project or your favorite vacation photos, among others. You want to avoid giving up the image completely, however, because it can lead people to think you're a bot or spammer. Also, once you have chosen the perfect photos, try not to change too often as you might confuse your followers. Step 2: Write a solid bio After looking at your picture, people will usually read your bio. People on Twitter are not generally known for their patience, however, so don't be too keen in describing yourself or filling out your bio with unnecessary tags. You only have 160 characters to write about what you do and like, but it should be more than enough. Feel empowered to use a little humor, but don't feel like you have to make it to be appreciated. Step 3: Get verified if possible Getting that little check mark next to your name can go a long way to proving that you're really who you say you are to your followers. Although Twitter has suspended its public posts for verification at present, public interest accounts can still be verified. If you can't verify it right away, because there are still many other ways to increase Count. Step 4: Tweet This might seem like a no-brainer, but consistently updating your Twitter account is the best way to keep (and get) followers. You don't want to risk people unfollowing you or forget who you are because you only tweet once every three months. If you're not a famous celebrity, you'll probably have to tweet a little more than that. uhhh of course I'll see mamma mia 2 for 500th time it's just mamma mia here we go again no mamma mia here we go once &mdash; Grace???? 1 @gracepxx point 31, 2018 Now, it doesn't necessarily mean tweeting about every little thing that appears in your head, even if Twitter can handle the stream of consciousness thing better than most sites. Instead, spare the internet and write only about things that you are passionate about. There isn't really a magic number as often you should tweet, but try to do so at least every day so others know that you use Twitter fairly regularly. Step 5: Responding and retweeting a retweet is a great way to connect with people with similar interests and share content that you enjoy. If you retweet a really cool article about the space station, then someone else can see it and start following you. The same goes for commenting on articles and tweets you like. Having something funny or interesting contribute to a conversation is bound to get some people interested in what you do and say. Some sites will ask others to retweet you, but we're yet to figure out an elegant way to do it. There is a time and place to add something like please RT, but it is few and far between. Step 6: Use hashtags Hashtags are a magical, magical thing. They can be used as sassy, further explain the point, or put more eyes on your tweet. Using hashtags that are trending is a great way to get more readers because your tweets will come if someone else is looking for that particular tag. It's also nice to be part of the conversation, and get the opportunity to connect with people who may have similar interests or opinions as you. #WeUnderstandThatAsCorporateEntitiesOurPresenceInCertainDiscussionsIsNotAlwaysRequiredSoWeWillStriveToLimitOurActivitiesToJustSellingYouShit &amp;amp; Slack (@SlackHQ) September 18, 2014 It's entirely possible to overdo it with hashtags, however, especially on Twitter. While it may be okay to attach 10 or 15 hashtags to an Instagram post, you should leave it on one or two on Twitter. Don't #hashtag, #in #your #tweet. Not only does this make your tweets difficult to read, but no one is going to look for most of these terms, and it might end up making you look ridiculous. Tweeting about trending topics can help you build your audience, but if nothing really hits your imagination, you can always try to do something on your own. Step 7: Follow people who have similar interests though you'll probably end up doing it naturally if you spend enough time on Twitter, after people you like is actually a great way to catch them Followers. If you follow people who share your interests, they are generally more likely to follow you back and/or retweet you. This exposes you to all their followers, who can also share similar interests with you. From there, the cycle continues. Give people what they want as long as they want the same things as you. Tagging people with similar interests in your posts (moderate) can also bring followers, as these accounts are more likely to interact with your posts if you haven't already been on their radar. That doesn't mean you only have to tweet about one particular thing - if you're working on a particular social media brand - but find people that you appreciate and will probably appreciate you in turn. Step 8: Know when to tweet You'll definitely get some readers if you're constantly tweeting at 3 a.m., but you want more than just some. Twitter, like most social media sites, gets the most traffic at 9 .m, noon, and 6 p.m. for fairly obvious reasons. These times directly correlate with when people go to work, on their lunch break, and leaving work. This is when people are most actively checking their phones and computers. Another clever trick is to pay attention to the tweets that get the most engagement and retweet them at another tip. This will ensure that followers in other time zones can still see your content, and it's a good way to cover your base. We don't recommend doing it with every tweet, or even most of them, but every once in a while it can give the attention you desire. So, go out and try some of these tips! If they don't work right away, just stick around, post, and interact with things you like. Sooner or later, people will follow.
